Marining pond Marining ponds, also called ore ponds, are artificial bodies of water for the purpose of recovering metal or metal-bearing ores, usually from acidic ores and sulfides. Depending on the task and the available technology, marinas may be ponds or basins. Amongst metal mining operations they are mostly used for the leaching of acidic ores. The ponds can be created in various ways and are usually fed by one or more settling basins which effect sedimentation. Since the mid-20th century they are typically used for the extraction of zinc, copper, lead and silver ores from sulfide ores. Although the primary purpose of the marina is to leach the ore, it may also serve to stabilize the sulfides or provide a measure of fluoride concentration from the ore. The marina is constructed in a different way than a typical settling basin. In the case of the many zinc mills that have been operated at the Savannah River Plant, large mounds of ore and processing by-product were processed with a sequence of settling basins and marinas. These settling basins were typically elongated in the direction of flow, allowing the settling material to move towards the centre of the basin, forming a sediment plug to prevent material from ever leaving. The construction of the marinas was similar to that of settling basins, and consisted of a concrete or clay bottom, with a flat or gently sloped upstream side, and an overburden of crushed rock, sand and gravel to prevent erosional damage to the bottom of the pond during the leaching process. Selection of a suitable marina basin depends on many factors. The depth of the pond, the size and shape of the ore being processed, and the kind of ore being processed are all key considerations. The ponds were originally fed by a settling basin upstream of the marina. This has proved to be one of the most effective ways of moving large quantities of processed ore towards the pond. The removal of the ore from the surface is accomplished by a sluice fitted with a sand pump. Each pond is typically at least 25 m long and 8
